HOWARTER et al. disclose a satellite wide area communications network for financial transactions in which multiple transaction card readers are linked to host computers via a satellite link. The transaction card readers interface to a modem unit, and transaction information is then communicated across a satellite network to a master transmitter/receiver. The master transmitter/receiver then distributes the information to a destination host computer for processing.

OGASAWARA discloses an electronic shopping system in which a server obtains a customer's telephone number, and then searches a customer information database for that telephone number. If the number is found in the database, then the server assumes that an authorized customer is placing the call (column 5).

GOERKE discloses user authentication across multiple telecommunications networks in which an authentication centre stores an identification code for each registered subscriber to the network. This identification code is then compared to the identification code in a user terminal for authentication of the user terminal (columns 1 and 4).

Obviousness

HOWARTER et al. teach a satellite communication network for transmitting financial transaction data from transaction card readers to host computers containing card specific data required for the financial transaction. A card is swiped at the card reader, and an operator uses a keyboard on the transaction card reader to input additional information relating to the transaction. A remote satellite transmitter/receiver transmits information relating to a sales transaction to the satellite, which then transmits the information to a communications network. The information is then received by a host computer (settlement unit) for processing (figure 1).

HOWARTER et al. do not teach maintaining a database for storing identification codes of the card reader terminals at the settlement unit, however, both OGASAWARA and GOERKE teach maintaining a customer information database or an identification code database at a central location for authentication of user terminals.

It would have been obvious to a person skilled in the art to incorporate the identification code databases of one of OGASAWARA or GOERKE in the network of HOWARTER et al.

Claims 1 to 2 do not comply with section 28.3 of the Patent Act as the subject matter of the claims would have been obvious having regard to the satellite communication network for transmitting financial transaction data from transaction card readers as disclosed by HOWARTER et al. in view of the identification code databases of one of OGASAWARA or GOERKE.

New matter

The amendment to claims 1 and 2, made on September 16, 2004, contains new matter which goes beyond the content of the application as originally filed. The statement that a communication request is made to a "requested communication destination" is not supported by the original disclosure. The new matter must be removed in order to comply with section 38.2 of the Patent Act.

Indefiniteness

The term "the card settlement service" (claim 1, lines 14 to 15) has no antecedent.

Claim 1 is directed to a settlement unit which comprises "a database". An abstract item such as a database cannot be considered to be a machine, or a component of a system. In order to elevate the database from an abstract idea to a machine, or a component of a system, software must be claimed as the medium embodying the program in a material or physical form.

Claim 2 is dependent upon claim 1 and fails to overcome the objections made for that claim.

For the above reasons, claims 1 and 2 are indefinite and do not comply with subsection 27(4) of the Patent Act.

In view of the foregoing defects, the applicant is required, under subsection 30(2) of the Patent Rules, to amend the application in order to comply with the Patent Act and the Patent Rules or to provide arguments as to why the application does comply.
